

Sadie Mae Johnson

November 16, 1914 - June 26, 2002

Sadie Johnson was born on November 16, 1914 in Greenville, South Carolina to Adolph and Ethel Hughes. She attended grade school in Greenville, South Carolina with great pride. It was there she met and later married the man whose father owns a candy store, the late Mr. Horace A. Johnson. He was her life long partner for over sixty years. From this union four children were born: Ethel, Sallie and the twins, Matthew and James. After relocating to Baltimore City, Mrs. Johnson became one of the founders of a neighborhood community church. She was known for her outspokenness and her way of letting you know just what she thought. She was proud of and dedicated to her husband and children. Always mothering and disciplining, the church was her main source of life-style, a place where she became greatly respected. Sister Johnson loved the Lord. She also loved a good joke and hardy laugh. She was very witty at times, always leaving you with something to think about. She love to tell people, "I might have been born at night, but not last night" as she watched the look on your face. She also loved the hymns and shared with people every day how good God was. One of those favorite hymns was "There's A Bright Side Somewhere." She leaves to mourn: one daughter, Ethel Blakley of Greenville, South Carolina; son, James Johnson of Baltimore, Maryland; two daughters-in-law, Janey P. Johnson and Terri M. Johnson; ten grandchildren, sixteen great-grandchildren, a host of nieces, nephews and friends.
